Subterranean formations penetrated by well bore have many different fluids therein. Typically, the fluids have been produced to the surface through an exit pipe which connects the formation to a well casing or through an injection well. The injection of a fluid into the formation may be beneficial if the fluid enters the formation and into the production well in a location and in a manner to restore production fluids to the location and increase production therefrom. It is desirable to be able to inject fluids into the formation at a formation location of interest, and to provide sufficient control over the location of the injection. Due to the location of the well bore relative to the formation location of interest, it is desirable to place the well bore at an angle relative to the formation location. In deviated or horizontal well bores, a relatively long length of the well bore is at an angle relative to the vertical. In order to provide a desired length of injection, it is necessary to place an injection well at a selected location along the length of the well bore. Prior art injection wells have been positioned at various locations along a well bore for fluids to be injected into the formation. Generally, the injection wells have been located at either an upper portion of the well bore or at a lower portion of the well bore. When the injection well is placed in the upper portion of the well bore, fluids produced from the formation will usually flow into the injection well. The fluids may cause plugging and the well can become choked. It is desirable to avoid placing the injection well within the region being produced. If the injection well is placed in a lower portion of the well bore, it is desirable to provide a fluid through the injection well back into the producing zone. This is done in order to move the fluids away from the formation and avoid plugging of the injection well. When the well bore is horizontal, it is difficult to position the injection well in the lower portion of the well bore. Frequently, it is not possible to provide an injection well sufficiently proximal to the producing zone. Frequently, when the injection well is located at a distance from the producing zone, the injection well will be at an angle to the producing zone, and the volume of the fluids from the zone will tend to follow the well bore. That is, the volume of fluids will tend to flow through the length of the well bore rather than through the injection well. The prior art has attempted to provide injection wells in horizontal well bores. U.S. Pat. No. 4,

Q: Exception in thread "main" java.lang.NumberFormatException: For input string: "XXX" I'm having problem with java 8 and Stringbuilder. Im trying to do regex replace, but i'm getting NumberFormatException. `StringBuilder temp = new StringBuilder(); Pattern regex = Pattern.compile("[^123]*"); Matcher m = regex.matcher("abc 123"); while(m.find()){ temp.append(m.group()); } System.out.println(temp);` but im getting this exception: `Exception in thread "main" java.lang.NumberFormatException: For input string: "abc 123" at java.base/java.lang.NumberFormatException.forInputString(NumberFormatException.java:65) at java.base/java.lang.Integer.parseInt(Integer.java:672) at java.base/java.lang.Integer.parseInt(Integer.java:732) at java.base/java.lang.Integer.parseInt(Integer.java:822) at java.base/java.lang.Integer.parseInt(Integer.java:848) at com.example.me.mycom.Main.main(Main.java:17) thank you A: The issue is that your regex has a * where you are expecting a . The "[^123]*" will match all the characters between the * and "[^123]*". After you run the code you posted, you have a StringBuilder that contains: abc 123 ^--- The ^ is outside the character class, and has no effect. |--- Notice the pipe in the middle? This is the cause of the exception. |--- Because you put a pipe there, Java is thinking that you want to set the match to a range of three characters. Not sure why you would do that, but that is the error you have. EDIT: Based on your comment, you may have to simplify your regex as follows. Pattern regex = Pattern.compile("?`
